- Ecological transition is feasible
- Encouraging ways out of the man-made crises
- Eminent author and popular speaker

Franz Alt's current book is thoroughly optimistic. We have learned much during the Corona pandemic and have concentrated all of our forces to withstand a life-threatening and global catastrophe. This includes recognising scientific findings, planning across countries and acting consistently – individually and in society as a whole. These experiences can motivate us to also master the other challenges that threaten our planet and humanity. Franz Alt describes signs of hope for a better future: We are already in the process of creating the energy transition and new forms of mobility; we can stop global warming, ecologically transform the economy and disarm nuclear weapons. In Germany and throughout the world, activists, charismatic politicians and social movements are committed to a liveable future for everyone. Franz Alt encourages us with many concrete examples: We can reshape our future if we combine our intellectual insights and emotional forces, rethink our lives, allow new feelings and take innovative of actions.
